The weapon and armor section of Basch's License Board. For the page on the original version of the game, see /Original Hm, looks like you can't even equip that yet. Know why? You don't have the License for it. Think of Licenses as mile posts, marking your progress as your combat skills improve. Swords, Bows, Black Magicks, White Magicks... None of it does you a lick of good until you have the License to use it. The License Board is the ability system used in Final Fantasy XII, which forms the basis of the job system. It was created by Hiroyuki Ito, the game's director. The system consists of different tiled boards for each job with hundreds of squares, each square representing an ability, spell, equipment piece or augment. By defeating enemies in battle, characters earn License Points, abbreviated as LP. Characters must spend their LP to activate squares on the License Board, granting them access to new abilities and allowing them to equip stronger weapons and armor. The original License Board is identical for all six playable characters, while in the Zodiac versions, it differs for each job. Some licenses also cost different numbers of LP when compared to the original. Mechanics[] Van learning new Licenses. The License Board is a checked board, with numerous squares each relating to a license. Licenses that the player already has appear solid, squares adjacent to already activated squares appear glowing, while the rest of the squares on the board are blank. When highlighted, each square displays the name of the corresponding license, the amount of LP needed to activate it as well as what equipment pieces or abilities are connected to that square. When a player takes a new license, it turns solid and the licenses above, below and to the sides of the new license light up. Only licenses lit up in this fashion may be activated, as opposed to being able to activate any square any time. While most licenses are available to all players, an exception is made for Espers (all versions) and Quickenings (original version), which appear for all characters until activated, at which point the square vanishes from the boards of the other characters. This means only one character may acquire a summon. Summon licenses have to be unlocked by beating the respective Esper in battle. In the Zodiac versions, each board has four Quickening licenses, the last one disappears. This can make things tricky, because the Quickening licenses often bridge to some other licenses. The Shikari job's ninja blade licenses are behind Quickenings, so the player cannot equip them until they want. License Points are earned towards activating squares by defeating enemies in battle. With the exceptions of rarer and stronger enemies, including bosses, most enemies give a single LP. Enemies killed by Pouch or Zalmora's Kill do not give LP. Unlike Experience Points, all characters gain LP regardless of if they are in the active party or not. Equipping the Golden Amulet doubles the LP earned for that party member. Unlocking all licenses, including three Quickenings, requires 13,330 LP. This does not include the Esper licenses, which together cost 805 LP. Upon completing every character's License Board, including the Espers and Quickenings, the player earns Rasler's icon in the Sky Pirate's Den. In The Zodiac Age, the "Conqueror" trophy is unlocked for acquiring 48,000 total LP. Board[] The License Board is significantly revamped in the Zodiac versions. When a character joins the party, the player can assign them one of twelve jobs. Unlike the original game where everyone uses the same License Board, each of the twelve jobs in the Zodiac versions has a different board. In the International Zodiac Job System version (exclusive to Japan), once a character chooses a job, they cannot change it. In the Xbox One, Steam, PS4 and Switch versions, the player can change boards and recover any spent LP at any time by talking to Montblanc at the Clan Centurio headquarters without any cost or limit to the number of board changes (the feature was patched in the PS4 and Steam versions). Characters also start with a number of licenses, which remain after a job has been chosen, even if the corresponding board does not contain said licenses. In Final Fantasy XII: The Zodiac Age, each player character can have two License Boards. Once a character unlocks "Second Board" on the License Board, they can select a second job to complement their abilities, and toggle between a view of one board and the other. Licenses are shared between boards owned by the same character; activating one will activate the corresponding one on the other board as well. This has potential implications for the choice of first and second job, and even the licenses which are purchased before the second board is obtained. For example, all four of Shikari's ninja sword licenses are connected to the board of Quickenings, but a maximum of only three Quickenings can be bought; if another job is chosen first, the player may opt to purchase no Quickenings until after the Tomb of Raithwall to make sure they will not lock themselves out of a desirable ninja sword. Duplication of licenses can also work in the player's favor: a Black Mage has Magic Lore easily available, near the start; they do not progress the character far towards the edges of their board. However, should the second board be something like the Archer, then those primary, nearby licenses are unlocked on the Archer board farther away from the start; nearer powerful late game licenses. This also works with jobs like the Monk, with its numerous Battle Lore and +HP licenses. Another job can even unlock licenses behind Espers; for example, any of the eight jobs that get +310 HP can unlock Greatswords 2 with White Mage without having to buy Chaos. Espers can bypass Espers: getting Exodus for Red Battlemage can open up Heavy Armor 8, 9 and 10 for itself, but also Heavy Armor 10, 11 and 12 for Archer without needing Shemhazai (and vice versa), since 10 is activated on the Archer's board. Thus first jobs and their licenses can also be chosen for the access they give to abilities on the second board and vice versa. The corresponding weapons, magicks or technicks must also be obtained, however. The difference between the +1 boosts to Strength from Battle Lore and +1 boosts to Magick from Magic Lore is a maximum of +16 each, whereas the biggest difference between the base strength of the characters is six, at level 99. Because the bonuses to damage-dealing stats come only from licenses, rather than the jobs themselves, combinations of similar jobs do not enhance damage. Instead, combining e.g. fast and light jobs with slow and heavy ones, or magick with melee, reduces the risk of redundant duplication of licenses. This way the light jobs gain more sturdiness and the heavy jobs more speed. Being able to choose between melee and magick characters makes characters more versatile, though there are twelve basic, and six characters who can each have two boards. The player does not need to use all boards evenly, and use all of them; the same can be used by more than one character, as often a board has good synergy with various combinations. Job selection criteria can include the value of the licenses a character when they first enter the party, such as Van, Fran and Balthier's Steal. If any of these characters is given the Black Mage job, for example, they will not need to go the Zalmora's Steal to gain access to Poach. Characters can get licenses that are extremely rare; out of all the White Magick licenses and all the other jobs that can get them, only the White Mage can get White Magicks 1, yet all of the female characters get it from the start. The player may opt to play without assigning their characters jobs, but the characters will not learn new abilities. Multiple characters can share the same job. Any unit licenses can be used without activating their adjacent license. Each job has licenses, usually valuable high level ones, which are separated from the main area of the board by Espers, and since only one character can purchase each Esper license and bridge the gap, only that character can access these "bonus" licenses. This gives an advantage to certain combinations of Espers and jobs, although it is arguably not as important as the combinations of jobs.
